What can impair your driving?

Alcohol, marijuana, and other drugs change your ability to drive because they slow your coordination, judgment, and reaction times. Cocaine and methamphetamine can make you more aggressive and reckless. If you use two or more drugs at the same time, including alcohol, it can amplify the effects of each drug. Some prescription and over-the-counter medicines can cause extreme drowsiness and dizziness. Read and follow all warning labels before driving. Warnings against “operating heavy machinery” include driving a vehicle. You can’t accurately judge how impaired you are – which is why no one should drive after using any drugs or drinking alcohol.

If you feel different, you drive different.
